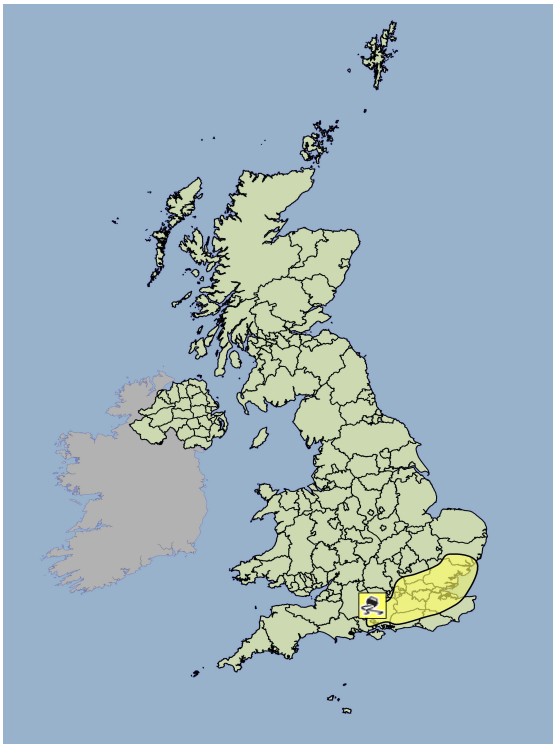
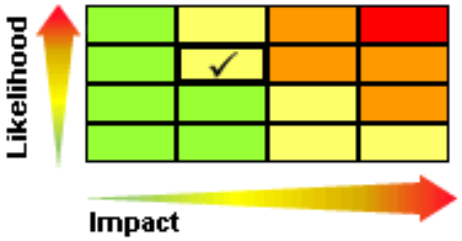
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
Further snow showers will continue to affect parts of southeastern England through the rest of this afternoon and evening. These snow showers will then tend to ease and become lighter and less frequent in nature overnight before finally dying out during the course of Friday morning. Any accumulations are expected to be small and patchy but will lead to icy patches and slippery surfaces as road surface and pavement temperatures fall below zero degrees Celsius this evening.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Ice

Valid from 17:00 on Thu, 04th Apr 2013 until 09:00 on Fri, 05th Apr 2013

Snow showers may lead to slushy deposits on some surfaces in rural areas this afternoon, evening and overnight. As darkness falls, temperatures will drop sharply leaving icy patches where any slushy deposits lie. The public should be aware of possible disruption, particularly to travel.
